

My son Ben celebrated the end of his GCSE's in 2008. It was supposed to be a happy night, a night of celebration. Ben and his friends went out to the pub to celebrate and on their way back they noticed they were being followed. Three older teenagers were following them. They were scared and worried so they decided to run after them. My boy was terrified and confused. An act took place earlier in the pub it was an altercation that had nothing to do with Ben and his friends. The three older boys caught up to my son and senselessly stabbed him to death. He was the 17th teenager killed in London that year.

In
the
place I
grew up
there weren't
a lot of
opportunities.
Luckily for me, I
was in a big group of friends but we then
had trouble with the other estates. One of my mates said I should carry a knife. I tried it and eventually felt safe and protected. For a while, it was a good decision that was until I saw a lad attack another one from the other estate. He stabbed him and killed him. Also, my uncle had been stabbed and at that moment I knew that this wasn't what I wanted. I realised that carrying my knife didn't protect me and it only made things worse.
When I was younger I enjoyed boxing and so I thought right ill get back into that. I took inspiration from the older lads at the gym and it was a big thing
for me
knowing that they have
been in my
shoes and
set the same
goals as I have. Boxing
came at the right time it
taught me to focus on what matters: my
school work,
my friends,
and family. It
changed my life and got
me out of the bad
path that I was going down.

A nighttime photograph of a London street scene. In the foreground, a yellow tram is visible on the left, and another tram is further down the street. A tall, colorful billboard stands on the right, displaying the words 'KINDNESS AT ITS PROPER LEVEL' in a rainbow gradient. The background shows a modern building with a distinctive lattice facade. The overall atmosphere is urban and vibrant.
